Unspoken Abandonment:
Sometimes the hardest part of going to war is coming home. Prepare to walk more than a mile in one soldier's boots as you see exactly what it's like to go to war and face the struggles of coming home. This is as real

Unspoken Abandonment is Wood's story of his time serving in combat operations in Eastern Afghanistan, and his difficulty readjusting to his life at home after the war. I have many friends in the service and have spoken to them about their time in combat, but I've never truly understood the psychological implications of war until reading this book.
